The Modern Press.

BY D. D. WHELON.

The superiority of the modern forms of the school over the ancient, is by no means as striking as that great triumph and parent of triumph—of modern over ancient ages, the PRESS. What a sorry figure would the establishment of the fraternal co-operation of the Sossi & Co. exhibit—the exact publishing house of Augustan Rome—with their few hundreds of unwieldy volumes of rolled parchment, painfully transcribed with a reed or iron pen, beside our Harper & Brothers, whose more advertisement catalogues would furnish more pages than Augustan Rome ever published.

Much the same figure which the squadrons of Persia and Gretian barques, which fought the sea fight of Salamis would exhibit beside the modern "Iron-sides" and "Peace-makers" who achieve the Triumphant and Navarino of our day.

President Jefferson's immortal squadron of gun-boats might have vanquished the whole navy of antiquity in a single night. But the glories of history, the most profound volumes of history, and the sea-fight of Salamis would exhibit beside the modern "iron-sides" and "Peace-makers" who achieve the Triumphant and Navarino of our day.
